2. 4 independently selectable frequencies. No. of frequencies should be of 8. Four absolute and four differential
3. Frequency range shall be 20Hz to 5MHz.for ECT and 20 to 250 kHz or more for RFT mode.
4. Mixers – minimum of 4.
5. Built-in hard disk drive for data storage and external storage on to an optical disk drive or flash card or pen drive (through USB port).
6. On screen display of minimum 4 impedance planes and 4 strip chart modes. Display of any selected channels and combinations.
7. Horizontal and vertical scales should be independently selectable.
8. Defect amplitude and depth measurement functions should be available.
9. Phase and amplitude measurements should be continuously displayed on the menu side and selection and setting should be possible.
10. Should have digital filters for low and high pass.
11. Coil matching for simultaneous detection in the differential mode as well as absolute mode with compensation for temperature drifts. No separate external reference shall be required for absolute channel.

12. Selectable gates and thresholds with on screen display of the selected values in colour should be associated with audio, visual alarms and logic gates.
13. Suitable analog outputs and interface for printer.
14. Automatic identification of defects with respect to the calibration and threshold levels and transfer of the data to the relevant files for post analysis.
15. Menu should be available for parameter setting once the tube geometry and material are defined.
16. Probe travel speed shall be from 0.5 to 2.0 m/sec.
17. Data collection should match with the probe speed with sufficient sampling rate and not less than 10 kHz sampling rate.
18. System should be capable of operating the probe in both pneumatic as well as electronic probe driving system with matching data collection.
19. Probe driving speed etc. shall be programmed controlled. Signal outputs to be fed either to the main control unit or computer and these outputs should be correlated with reasonable accuracy to the axial position of the probe inside the tube.
20. Demo video tapes should be supplied with the system.
21. The system should have the universal 4 pin type probe connections for compatibility.
22. Should have the facility for balancing electronically to avoid external probe for absolute mode for measuring tube wall thickness.

24. While operating in remote field mode magnetic saturation levels shall be programmed controlled and must be capable of operating wide units of probes.
25. System with array probe with at least 16 elements and upto 64 multiplex capability shall be there and preferred within the same price range.
26. Similarly a system with better operational and software functions (particularly for online operation) will be preferred.
27. Power supply of 200 to 250 VAC, 48 to 52Hz.
28. System demonstration is required for considering as a prospective supplier.

II THE FOLLOWING SOFTWARE SHOULD BE PROVIDED.

a) Software for data acquisition and data analysis of the tube.

The software should have the facility to feed the information about the heat exchanger, tube, row and zone while data acquisition itself. The raw data from the tubes should be analyzed thoroughly as per the set conditions like defect amplitude, phase, etc. automatically. The analysis shall be done optionally at floating thresholds (to take care about local noise, etc.) or in automatic mode.

Suitable mix channels shall be created for the elimination of baffle plate signals and at the same time the defect signals should be highlighted. Suitable filter channels with first and second order cross correlation with high and low band pass filtering to eliminate noise and interfering signals shall be available. The filtered and cross correlated signals shall be displayed in impedance planes as well as strip charts. Facility should be available for automatic calibration and preparation of calibration table and curves for each set-up.

The refined defect data of each tube should be saved in suitable form for down loading to the report making software. The manufacturer should clearly mention the analysis speed for each tube. Higher analysis speeds without scarifying the details will be preferred. Customization should be possible i.e., the user should be able to define the heat exchanger/ condenser features like tube layouts and lengths, tube sheet or baffle plate locations, numbering conventions, etc., before the starting the data analysis.

The defect data should be checked for gross errors, other improbabilities, against the built-in norms for similar tube material, geometry and service conditions. The refined data for each tube should be automatically compiled in statistical modes and any gross deviations should be highlighted. All the major observations shall be displayed in user defined, colour codes as well as prioritization symbols.

b) Software for report preparation with tube sheet mapping:

Suitable software should be quoted for generation of comprehensive reports utilizing the collected data with the following features.

The software should have the customization features for the following:

1. Tube identification numbers.
2. Tube, row and column numbers.
3. Baffle plate numbers.
4. Phase, voltage magnitude.
5. Percent wall loss with ID or OD defect identification.
6. Codes for pits, dents, cracks, etc.
7. Channel numbers and mixer numbers.
8. Generation of tube sheet mapping with colour coding after analyzing the collected data.

The operating system for data acquisition, data processing, post analysis, report preparation and tube sheet mapping should be in Microsoft windows 98 or later versions without sacrificing the speed. The report preparation/ tube sheet mapping should be able to done in Microsoft office.

- III Probe driving system should be quoted separately for pneumatic as well as electronic.
- IV A separate laptop computer should be supplied apart from the lunch box computer with all the post processing software loaded (state-of-the-art).
- V The supplier should provide the training for operating the system for two BHEL engineers at supplier's works.
- VI Supplier should quote the spares for trouble free operations of at least two years.
- VII 2 Nos of printed operating manuals should be provided along with the system.
